Steel and square subway carriages. The ones which slowly (but too fast) seem to disappear from our cities. All these nice subway models and pieces from Galjin Intrusion (Issue.#5) kept us craving for more. So when we received a new load of fresh photos for our previous issue (#6) we made this new article with Jáezo. A couple of weeks before we started printing, we sent the final preview of the article. We were used to receive a quick reply, but didn't hear anything in the following days. We sent him a reminder, but received the message that the inbox was full. Fuck. We sent some messages via Wickr, but no response at all. We didn't want to place the article without his approval, and with the deadline coming closer and closer, we contacted one of his friends. "Oh yeah man, he's in jail in Japan" was the answer we got.

Philadelphia: Philly is an amazing city and has a beautiful subway with its orange decor. We entered Philly 3 hours later after been in the Baltimore yard, quickly checked in to our motel and left all the stuff we had and went preparing for the next hit. We made our way along the wide huge highways to one of the most famous spots documented in Philadelphia when it comes to subway painting. Arriving at the spot you could recognize all the surrounding and atmosphere that you had seen in videos. Walking up the muddy little hill peeking your head up and seeing all those beautiful silver/orange models lined up next to another just made me smile and my eyes glow. After around 45 min checking/scooping the spot we decided to enter and this time we took our time painting and spent a well deserved 15-17 minutes there with some good atmospheric photos. Many times I have noticed and surprising myself that I enjoy just watching my friends paint and the atmosphere of the spot, taking photos and just soaking it up. That's why many times I try to speed up my painting just so I can get the photos that I want of the spot and friends. I couldn't believe that we just made 3 systems within 24 hours, everything just ran so smoothly that we agreed to celebrate it with a famous classic "Philly Cheesesteak" sandwich in the middle of the night. So goooooo! The next days we just enjoyed the city

Montreal: After Philadelphia we started our long journey up towards Canada and the blue model of Montreal. Crossing the border was no problem since we were as clean as a baby butt. The border patrol greeted us kindly and welcomed us to Canada asking our business there, "pleasure". We arrived into Montreal in the late afternoon and met up with a friend that took us to eat the famous poutine dish and I tell you it's a must to try. We talked a little about the how smoothly the action went. A major thanks to Aper for the help and checking for us. The rest of the days in Montreal we spent together by touring, eating, some walls and a nice hit on the commuter model that they have. We had an amazing time in Montreal and it's a great city that I highly recommend to visit. Everything worked out so good... "Let's just squeeze in a try in Toronto as well".

trip and about the possibilities and situation in Montreal. The plan was to try to hit the hangar straight at once. So we had our food and headed to get some supplies for the action. A couple hours later I was standing next to the blue model of Montreal. It was the luck of the Irish how everything went down and It's always a good reason to start a new crew when a group of people become good friends. Since we all already had our A crew we decided to start a B crew. So The Bteam was born on one of these classic nights, going out for a lot of Beer and Tits, bringing some Backjump Terror, and for sure eating a Broodje Tomaatt!
